Aid Program Discussed by Dr. Millikan

"The United States should develop constructive measures to meet the aspirations of underdeveloped countries," Dr. Max F. Millikan, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, said today in Utica.

Dr. Millikan, who helped formulate President Kennedy's economic policy toward the underdeveloped countries, was the fifth speaker in the Mohawk Valley Community College's lecture program, "Internationalism: The Challenge Ahead."

He is director of the MIT Center for International Study and a former assistant director of the Central Intelligence Agency.

Dr. Millikan termed his internal development proposal "the Boys' Club theory." The United States should employ constructive measures with underdeveloped countries, he said. "These would include economic systems, educational provisions, and community development."

"Economic change," he said, "is at the root of the destabilizing process in underdeveloped countries. It is an unsettling process producing frustration, dissatisfaction and local violence."
